Hostile Surveillance and Surveillance Detection for Corporate Security Managers and Directors

Monday 29th March, 2010
Barclays Building, 10, South Colonnade, Canary Wharf, London

The Need

For any attack, from the most simple to the most sophisticated, Hostile Surveillance is the earliest stage at which the professional security operator is likely to become aware of a potential hostile intent. Whether it is by terrorist or criminal groups, or single-purpose activists committed to disrupting AGM's, making anti-globalisation protests or simply obtaining high-profile media coverage, the ability to conduct hostile surveillance without fear of being spotted or diverted is one of the major considerations in Target Selection.

In the present world, every major organisation should consider Surveillance Awareness and Surveillance Detection as being of vital importance to its security operations, at every level from Group Director to ground-floor security personnel.

The Course

This 1-day seminar will introduce all of the main components of Hostile Surveillance, and will allow security managers to understand how HS is conducted, ways in which it can be detected, and effective prevention and deflection strategies.

All material is covered in a structured and realistic manner, and is designed to allow participants to gain the greatest amount of information that will be of immediate use to them in their working environment.

Course Material

- Principles of Surveillance Detection
- Hostile Surveillance in the Planning Cycle
- Best Practices From Around the World
